

What does it mean to be an Eagle? When this question was first posed to me, I took great pause. There are so many wonderful things about being an eagle, I didn't know where to start. But by looking at the question again, you can see that it is asking about "an Eagle," showing that I am one of many Eagles, and that is at the heart of what it means to be an Eagle. I am one in a community. To be an Eagle is to have membership into this beautiful BC community, where everyone has a place as long as they look for it. I work at the Office of Sustainability; I am a double major in Management and Leadership, and Environmental Studies; I am the Vice President of Armenian Club and EcoPledge; and I am a Kairos Leader. Each of these places gives me a home and a family on campus, and that is why I love it here so much.

The other Eagles on this campus are some of the most wonderful people I have ever met. Almost everyone I know is intellectually curious and ready to learn and discuss. I can't even count how many times I have sat down to lunch and had a philosophical debate with a friend or discussed the impact of different religions on the ways in which we function in society. Furthermore, Eagles are attracted to service, which is why 72% of us participate in volunteering through BC at some point during our time here. Between our thirst for knowledge and desire to help others, being an eagle means being part of our campus and greater Boston Community.
